Ever since I began my training in internal medicine and subsequently in neurology, I have been interested in subarachnoid haemorrhage and indeed chose this topic as a subject of study for my Doctorate in Medicine. It was because the information derived from a retrospective study of 312 patients proved to be so interesting that I published a monograph on the subject 30 years ago. My first reaction on reading this splendid book by my former colleagues in Newcastle, Mr. Sengupta and Dr. McAllister, was one of realisation of the extent to which knowledge about the condition and principles of management have been transformed. This splendidly comprehensive volume carefully reviews the earlier literature, analyses the anatomical, pathophysiological and clinical features of the condition in consummate detail and goes on to consider in depth all of those issues relating to investigation and medical and surgical management which continue to present challenges to neurologists and neuro-surgeons alike. When I began my personal study, angiography had still to be introduced as a routine method of radiological diagnosis in many centres in the U.K. and we were largely dependent upon clinical methods of diagnosis and assessment. How interesting it is to see that now, very properly, computerised tomography (CT scanning) takes precedence as an initial diagnostic instrument over angiography, and that lumbar puncture, once thought to be obligatory for diagnosis, is being used less and less since its dangers were fully appreciated.
