“Good, his car is here,” I panted as I crept upon his porch. “I hope he aint sleep.”

After a few moments of no one answering, my knocks turned into angry bangs of frustration. It was cold, and I was tired. I was so ready to burst out in tears, but I refused.

“Open the damn door Martel!” I screamed as loud as I could.

His bedroom was upstairs and in the back. So, after several more pounds, I went around the side to see if a light was on.

“Oh, this motherfucker got candles burning and shit?” I yelled as I noticed the flickering reflection bouncing off of the walls through the half opened curtains.

“This shit aint happening right now! I should just go kick the damn door in like I’m the fuckin’ police!” I shouted out in frustration as I went back to the front of the house.

By that time, I was feeling so damn stupid for continuing to go through the same crap that I was ready to give up. It definitely wasn’t worth it, but Martel was all I knew.
